Bio: Zachary Agatstein is currently a Doctoral candidate in Political Science, with a dual concentration in Comparative Politics and International Relations, at Northeastern University. He completed his Master's degree in Political Science from Northeastern University and previously was a Graduate in political science from Maryland's only public Honors College. His research interests include nationalism, genocide studies, human security, and European politics.

Among his most recent publications and presentations are “State Actors and Bystander Intervention: Denmark During the Holocaust” for the American Political Science Association Annual Conference (October 2021); “Propaganda in Your Pocket: National Myths, Politics, and Postage Stamps” for the Northeastern Political Science Association Annual Conference (November 2019); and finally, “Bystander Intervention and State Actors: Applying a Social Psychological Model to State Decision-making” for the Northeastern Political Science Association Annual Conference (November 2018).